

Development of Mental Health Services in Liberia

THE CARTER CENTER

Many Liberians witnessed their family and friends brutally killed or raped during Liberia's more than 13 years of devastating civil war, which ended in 2003. With only one practicing psychiatrist in the country and limited access to psychiatric medicines, the psychological impact of the conflict continues to cause tremendous suffering. For example, approximately 40 percent of Liberia's 3.4 million people experience post-traumatic stress disorder, alone.

At the invitation of the Liberian Ministry of Health and Social Welfare, The Carter Center is working to help the country build a sustainable mental health system that can address this void.

Compounding the problem are the stigma and misconceptions around mental illnesses that perpetuate suffering. Some patients, families, and health workers without mental health training perceive mental illnesses as a punishment for bad behavior and epilepsy as a contagious disease. Because of misunderstandings about mental illnesses and lack of services, families and communities may isolate or restrain people with mental illness or resort to potentially harmful practices that worsen distress. Due to stigma, lack of mental health training, and low supplies of essential medications, most individuals with mental illness and their families struggle throughout their lives.

Program Goals

Working with the Liberian government, the Carter Center's Mental Health Program has three main objectives to be completed by 2015:

1. Train a sustainable and credentialed workforce of mental health clinicians, including 150 specialized nurses and physician assistants and 300 other mental health professionals, such as community mental health workers. Existing nursing schools will host training programs to build the nation's capacity for health education. After graduation, nurses and physician assistants will have the opportunity to receive national credentialing as specialists in mental health, and graduates of the program will work within the primary health care system to provide mental health services to the population.

2. Assist the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare in establishing and implementing its National Mental Health Policy, including dramatically increasing coverage to reach 70 percent of the population.

3. Create anti-stigma campaigns nationwide to improve public understanding of mental illnesses. Additionally, the program plans to help establish advocacy groups, and educational programs to foster family and community support.

Mental Health and Liberia

- Approximately 50 to 70 percent of women and girls were sexually assaulted during the civil war.
- Among ex-combatants:
 - 44 percent have symptoms of post-traumatic stress disorder
 - 40 percent have symptoms of major depression
 - 11 percent have contemplated suicide
- Even the most serious mental illnesses can be effectively and affordably treated in Liberia and elsewhere throughout the world.
- A new partnership between the Liberian government and The Carter Center aims to dramatically improve access to mental health care services in the country.

DEVELOPMENT OF MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES IN LIBERIA

Frequently Asked Questions

How did the Carter Center Mental Health Program decide to get involved?

Building on nearly two decades of Carter Center efforts to foster peace and democracy in Liberia, the Carter Center Mental Health Program launched a five-year initiative in 2010 to help the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare create a sustainable mental health system that will address a broad range of mental health conditions. The Carter Center is the only nongovernmental organization working to support the ministry's long-term goals for improving public health in Liberia.

The educational model is based on the Carter Center's Ethiopia Public Health Training Initiative, which developed culturally relevant educational materials to train a workforce of more than 26,000 health professionals to address the void of rural health care in Ethiopia.

How will The Carter Center help increase the number of trained mental health professionals in Liberia?

Approximately 150 clinicians will be trained in semester-long sessions through Liberian partner universities and clinical sites. These trainees will receive national credentials and licensing. There is no cost to participate in the course, and learning materials are provided for free. The materials used in the course were developed by the Carter Center's Mental Health

Many Liberians face post-traumatic stress disorder following years of civil war. Many Liberians were displaced from their homes by the war and lived in refugee camps for long periods of time, including this young girl.

Program in collaboration with Liberian nurses, physician assistants, health instructors, and Ministry of Health staff to ensure training reflects Liberian mental health needs. These materials were also reviewed by international teaching and mental health experts.

How will this program make a difference?

Less than one percent of Liberians have access to mental health services, yet nearly 40 percent are believed to suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder due to their experiences during a brutal civil war. Based on nearly two decades of trusted partnership with the Liberian government on peace and democracy efforts, the Liberian government invited The Carter Center to help implement its National Mental Health Policy and expand care to 70 percent of Liberians, reducing disability and suffering from mental illnesses and building a stronger society.

How will this program be sustained?

The Carter Center's Mental Health Program will work closely with the Ministry of Health and Social Welfare from the start to ensure future sustainability of mental health services and develop permanent training and educational systems for future mental health workers. The program also will strive to integrate mental health services into the primary health care system of Liberia. Ongoing periodic evaluation of the entire initiative will focus on program performance and clinical outcomes.

Liberia's population is 3.4 million people, but formal care for mental illnesses is severely limited with only one practicing psychiatrist in the country.

The Carter Center's Mental Health Program was founded in 1991 by former U.S. First Lady Rosalynn Carter. The Mental Health Program works to promote awareness about mental health issues, reduce stigma and discrimination against those with mental illnesses, and achieve greater parity for mental health.
